Main Issues discussed

DRM is at the very top of the international agenda at the moment and it is key to sustainably financing development as well as to reaching the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). Participants expressed that in order to make use of this high level of political commitment, it is now time to start implementing projects on a wider scale than it is currently done. In doing so, assistance to DRM is to be viewed in a broader, institution-wide framework. Especially for least developed countries this would mean that support will very likely not be limited to technical assistance but also include support to IT systems and other infrastructure.

Whilst DRM is viewed to be a sustainable source of funding for future development, it was expressed that domestic revenues should not substitute for official development aid (ODA) but that these two funding channels are viewed as complementary.

Furthermore, it was stated that in order to ensure that improving the efficiency and effectiveness of tax collection will lead to a stronger bond between citizens and the state, taxation needs to be perceived as reasonable and fair. Support to DRM should therefore not be limited to technical assistance in tax administrations but also ideally include support to tax policies.

The Addis Tax Initiative (ATI) is happy to announce that since its launch in Addis in July 2015, 7 more partner countries have joined the ATI. Also, in this past year a monitoring framework was put in place. Currently, the Addis Tax Initiative is working on a new DRM database which will serve as an important coordination tool for support to partner countries in the field of DRM.

In Spring 2017, the first ATI Monitoring Report will be released, setting the baseline against which the commitment to doubling support to DRM will be measured. This will be complemented by the DRM Database which will serve as a coordination tool with regards to support provided in the field of DRM.
